Let's imagine the situation: the candidate found a suitable vacancy, wrote an excellent resume and a covering letter for her and sent them to the employer. A couple of days later, he gets the long-awaited answer. However, the unexpected happens: instead of an invitation to an interview, the future boss gives the candidate the task of writing an essay.

An essay is an essay in free form that expresses and argues the author's position on a particular issue. Although the essay is mainly associated with literature classes at school or homework at university, some people also write it in employment. An essay for an employer is an additional way to assess a potential employee. All because of the high competition on the labor market: when there are many excellent candidates around, you need to identify the best of the best. With the help of the essay, the employer also assesses the candidate's communication skills: the ability to write a competent business letter, the ability to clearly express and argue their thoughts.

The topic of the essay

The topic of the essay may be free or suggested by the employer. It is chosen in such a way that the candidate shows through the text his or her personal qualities, professional ambitions, vision of himself or herself as a specialist, level of competence in a particular issue, creativity, if it is a creative profession, or other skills and abilities.

For example, the employer may suggest the following topics:

- Me and my career;
- What else should we know about you as a candidate?
- My life goals;
- Tell me how you've overcome life's challenges;
- What was your interest in working for us?
